Cultural Stereotypes and the Self: A Closer Examination of Implicit Self-Stereotyping

Janetta Lun
University of Virginia

Stacey Sinclair
Princeton University

Courtney Cogburn
University of Michigan

Recent research and theory on implicit self-stereotyping suggests that individuals encode their self-concept in a manner that differentially weights and responds to culturally relevant and personally relevant representations of self. This paper presents findings from a study that examines the relationship between cultural stereotypes and self-concept in both Chinese and American students. The findings suggest that cultural stereotypes can influence self-concept in ways that are consistent with the cultural context in which they are embedded.
